It takes a village. I would not have made it through the tortuous process that resulted in this book -- learning from trial and error, reading books, consulting with business owners and attorneys, writing, editing, and writing again -- without the contributions of many people.

Below is a collection of people who have helped in so many ways. For your inspiration, support, and enduring patience, thank you. If I didn't mention you by name, I am still grateful and know you have made an impact.

To my loving family -- my supportive husband, Burak, and my children, Rex and Violet -- thanks for letting me turn our kitchen table into my makeshift writer's den, full of books everywhere and notes on the walls. Thank you to Rex and Violet for the many book title suggestions, quotes gleaned from your years of experience, strong opinions on everything that I brought to your attention, and the active conversations and support you gave me. To my dear sister and brother, for your constant support and love. To my dad, for being one of the first entrepreneurs that I learned from, and to my mom, who taught me to be different, to think outside the box, and to have compassion for everyone, especially for those who are in the most need. To my grandparents, who were hardworking and entrepreneurial examples, and my aunts, uncles, and cousins who have always been so supportive.

To my assistant, Gracie, who came into my life at the right time, the year I was writing a book, to help me in this challenging endeavor and pushed me through the deadlines and helped make this happen. We have so many inside jokes and a deep understanding of each other's processes, I have told her we have to work on another book together later. To my host families in Belgium for believing in me. To Rotary, which opened up so many opportunities to me. To all those super mentors who gave me that extra push of encouragement, provided an ear to listen and brainstorm, and the continued dedication to our relationships. To Reid Trautz for his endless mentorship -- the gift of your guidance is in large part what inspired me to write a book that helps our new generation of lawyers and their practices.

To my office staff, thank you for listening to my updates during our office meetings, for letting me crowdsource ideas, for helping with research, and accommodating my crazy schedule, but more importantly for providing me with incredible support and continuing to ensure that each and every one of my clients receives the impeccable service that each deserves.

My thanks go out to Danielle Polen, Sarah Redzic, and Richard Link, my publishers and editors at AILA, who believed in me, encouraged me, and supervised the editing and publication of this book. I also want to thank Mary Johnson, Associate Director of Marketing & Business Development, for her artistic talents and creative marketing, as well as the staff at AILA National.

To my friends -- my fellow businesswomen from my Women Business Owners Group, my fellow attorneys on listservs and forums, my fellow business owners from Goldman Sachs 10,000 Small Businesses, and other colleagues from Leadership Houston and American Leadership Forum -- thank you all of your insight and support.
